

NIGHT GALLERY

2276 E. 16th Street, Los Angeles, California 90021

nightgallery.ca

Julie Baumgardner, "A Guide to America's Next Great Art Neighborhood," The New York Times Style Magazine, January 11, 2017

T THE NEW YORK TIMES STYLE MAGAZINE

JANUARY 11, 2017

A Guide to America's Next Great Art Neighborhood

By JULIE BAUMGARDNER

Clockwise from left: Brie Ruais's "Spreading Out From Center in Five Directions (Premonition of a Butterfly), 130lbs," 2016, on view at Romer Young, a gallery in the Dogpatch section of San Francisco; an exterior view of the Minnesota Street Project, a massive warehouse complex of galleries and artists' studios that serves as the neighborhood's art hub; Daniel Rozin's "Wooden Mirror," on view at bitforms gallery's pop-up space.

Courtesy of the artist and Nicole Klagsbrun; courtesy of the Minnesota Street Project; Elizabeth Ajtay, courtesy of bitforms gallery

NIGHT GALLERY

2276 E. 16th Street, Los Angeles, California 90021

nightgallery.ca

T THE NEW YORK TIMES STYLE MAGAZINE

This week, the fourth edition of FOG Design+Art, the heavy-hitter fair benefiting SFMOMA, will open; and plenty of art-circuit regulars will head five miles southeast to the Dogpatch. Untitled, Art — a Miami Beach staple since 2012 — is concurrently hosting the inaugural edition of its satellite fair there, in an effort to promote “curatorial balance and integrity,” as the fair puts it. Here are some other destinations not to be missed.

The city’s oldest intact historic district, the Dogpatch has been a neighborhood of the future since the 1860s; it’s steeped in industry, with a mix of residential and manufacturing space. (The true origin of its name is a mystery; prevailing theories reference the dogfennel flower, the setting of the “Li’l Abner” comic strip and the onetime presence of roaming street dogs stashing meat scavenged from nearby Butchertown.) Since last spring, a slew of galleries have decamped from cushy downtown or Tenderloin outposts — and even, frequently, from New York — to the industrial lots around the 22nd and 3rd Streets corridor. Many have landed at the Minnesota Street Project (MSP), a 100,000-plus-square-foot complex of warehouses founded by the arts patrons and real estate investors Deborah and Andy Rappaport, housing galleries, nonprofits, artists’ studios and, soon, a restaurant and bar by Daniel Patterson of San Francisco’s beloved Coi.

An installation view of “Rip or Rag,” a solo show by Laeth Glenn currently on view at Altman Siegel Gallery. Courtesy of Altman Siegel Gallery

Until this past November, Claudia Altman Siegel’s near-decade-old space, Altman Siegel Gallery, stood in the 49 Geary building, the legacy downtown epicenter of San Francisco’s arts action that’s draining out to the Dogpatch. She now holds about 5,000 square feet in a converted warehouse at 1150 25th Street, the latest extension of Minnesota Street Project. “Already, I’d dare to say it’s much better than downtown,” she says. Timed to this spotlight week, the gallery has just opened a show by the painter Laeth Glenn, an artist discovered by Altman Siegel before her MFA graduation from UCLA in 2012. “The Dogpatch is definitely the destination if you’re interested in seeing art in San Francisco — it’s the place to go,” Altman Siegel says. “We have everything we need there. It’s becoming a scene because there are so many of us there at the same time. It sounds like it could be forced, from the outside, but it’s not. It’s just really fun.” 1150 25th St., altmansiegel.com.

An installation view of “Eau de Cologne,” opening this weekend at Adrian Rosenfeld. Courtesy of Adrian Rosenfeld

After some urging from Altman Siegel, her old friend Adrian Rosenfeld just moved in next door, giving up the director’s seat at Matthew Marks gallery in New York — a jump made also by Altman Siegel, nine years ago after working her way up at Lühring Augustine. This Saturday, Rosenfeld will unveil the inaugural show in an ambitious slate of programming that will see him partner with other global art dealers to develop unique projects in a space lit only with natural light. “Eau de Cologne,” developed in collaboration with the influential gallerists Monika Sprüth and Philomene Magers, hangs Jenny Holzer, Barbara Kruger, Louise Lawler, Cindy Sherman and Rosemarie Trockel in conversation together as artists who “make strong work about the individual in society,” Rosenfeld says — a fitting theme for the gallery’s newfound home. “We’re our own thing,” Rosenfeld says of the Dogpatch. “What feels new over here is the spirit of collaboration, permeability and experimentation.” 1150 25th St., (415) 285-2841.

NIGHT GALLERY

2276 E. 16th Street, Los Angeles, California 90021

nightgallery.ca

T THE NEW YORK TIMES STYLE MAGAZINE

An installation view of "Fifteen-Year Anniversary Exhibition," a group show on view at bitforms gallery's San Francisco pop-up. Elisabeth Aljay, courtesy of bitforms gallery

Two new tenants at MSP, bitforms gallery and Invisible-Exports, have just landed from New York's Lower East Side as pop-ups. Bitforms's director, Steven Sacks, celebrated his gallery's 15-year anniversary with a survey of his top artists, including R. Luke Dubois and Daniel Canogar. Risa Needleman, the founder of Invisible Exports, took a leap and chose to exhibit the artist Cary Leibowitz, also known as "Candyass," to coincide with a solo show of his work opening at S.F.'s Contemporary Jewish Museum on Jan. 26. "I love that it feels like a boomtown," Needleman says of the city, "constantly changing and adapting, and, at least in terms of the art world, figuring out its place and identity." 1275 Minnesota St., Suites 200 and 106, bitforms.com and invisible-exports.com.

Kazuo Shiraga's "Chisonsei Isshika," 1960, on view in "Earthquakes and the Mid Winter Burning Sun" at Ever Gold Projects. Courtesy of Ever Gold Projects

Within Minnesota Street Project's first building and central hub located on its namesake avenue are about a dozen other galleries, including the last gallery to sign in that space, Ever Gold Projects — run by a San Francisco native, Andrew McClintock, who grew up riding his bike in the Dogpatch. When Ever Gold's previous lease became unaffordable in the Tenderloin, just under a year ago, McClintock relocated. "Conceptually, there is much more space out in the Dogpatch — space to think and breathe in this ever-encroaching city," he says. "I saw my sales more than double last year, and our shows are being seen by thousands of people." This Saturday, McClintock will open a show that puts Kazuo Shiraga, a master of the Gutai group, and the current market darling Kour Pour in dialogue. 1275 Minnesota St., Suite 105, evergoldprojects.com.

Brie Ruais's "Drawing of a Vessel," 2016 (left) and Rosy Keyser's "Terrestrial Escape Hatch," 2016, both on view in a show of the two artists' work at Romer Young Gallery. Courtesy of the artist and Nicole Klagbrun; courtesy of the artist and Maccaroni NY

The action isn't just at Minnesota Street Project — in fact, the NADA-affiliated Romer Young Gallery has been down on 22nd Street since 2002. "We were a lone wolf down here for a long time," co-director Joey Piziali says. The gallery, which will open "Squid Ink," a show of work by the New York-based renegades Rosy Keyser and Brie Ruais, on Thursday, has seen the Dogpatch shrink and expand in response to the economic moods of the city. "It's going to take a collective effort to make this art movement/district really last," Piziali notes. "It would be great to see the city get more invested in supporting art initiatives. While we have a small, but very supportive, local collector base, it will also be necessary for that community to grow in order to match the current growth of the city." 1240 22nd St., romeryounggallery.com.